Letters from an officer of the British army, received by a Topeka girl. Miss Gladys Gaw, give a view of some of the details of the great war, and a personal glimpse of the scenes among the bug guns on the westren

ont. He says, in part:
"I am out in a tent in the counfry, in perfect peace almost, away frem noisy roads and transport. My tent is in the corner of a dry field, under the shade of a tree and looks out across an expanse of green fields and crops. It is a good change from dirty villages and shell-destroyed houses, which one sees in most places. We hear the firing, even the rifle shots. The mess and the signal offi-cers are in the adjoining field.

"I had a tremendous day yesterday and walked about twenty miles about Ypres. I had a look around some of our old haunts of November. The town is a wonderful though a terriruins, but to see a place this size withone a house standing, is unusual. There is nothing left but the skeletons of the houses, if even that much.

cathedrals and churches have only the four walls standing, and these, too, with enormous holes in them. One of the churches has lost three of its four steeples, and the remaining one is leaning and will fall in a slight wind. The smells are awful. There is hardly a house which has not been hit by a shell, and the thousands of shells the Germans must have used on the place shows that they are not, at present anyhow, short of ammunition. The fine old ramparts are all that have withstood the gunners. The line of the canal would be a topping line to hold.

"My tent is comfortable with table and chair, and even a carpet. There is a bed of logs and planks on which is an excellent mattress (where it is an excellent mattress (where it came from I know not and ask no inconvenient questions); a jug and basin also has put in an appearance. The tent has been da bed over with brown paint so as to make it less conspicuous for acroplanes to spot-conspicuous for acroplanes to spot.

"I have come back from a fifteenmile walk, and an exciting one, as the Huns have been particularly aggressive. As I was walking along one of the lines outside Ypres the Huns put a fat crump 2cross my bows. It burst in the air, and they were obviously ranging on something. There was a battery of ours in action a hundred yards to my right, beautifully hidden among a thick hedge. I waited a minute to see what the Germans hidden among a thick hedge. I waited a minute to see what the Germans would do. In a few seconds there was a whistle and another crump burst in front of the battery. The next burst 20 yards in front of the guns; the next, unpleasantly near me. They had got the range and put fifteen shells bang into the hedge amongst the guns, which, incidentally, went on shooting. I moved to a more healthy place. Then the Huns began putting their heavy shrapnel behind the guns, their idea being to catch anyone who might be running back or bringing up stretchers.

"I don't see, even when we win,

"I don't see, even when we win, how Germany can make good a quar-ter of damage she has done. They ter of damage she has done. They have gone on shelling a tower in Ypres where they think we take obcervations. The main roads in the town are clear, but that is all, and the rats are crawling everywhere.

"All day we were just hanging on by one line, but we were in touch with our brigades and were actually through to the troops in the first line of German trenches. The front lines then got rather churned up. At my office alone we dealt with 750 messages without any delay. During the morning we had a lot of German prisoners brought in. One or two of them were fine looking fellows. They were all confident of their ultimate victory. They said they were not going to the said they were not go ing to use gas any more as they thought it had been rather a failure thought it had been rather a failure and had often affected their own people, but as we found a gas tube on one of them, I didn't quite believe it. They said it was for distinct disinclination to take prisoners these days. The Huns have been shelling our ramparts. A curious thing happened. It was a lovely clear day, when suddenly it began to pour rain, as we thought. What really happened was that a large shell burst in the moat that a large shell burst in the moat and threw up a jet of water which come down on our outside like rain, lasting nearly a minute. They dropped a crump or two on top of the ramparts where some Gordons were tucked away in a deep trench. I can up to see if they were all right. I found a bedraggled Highlander drenched to the skin and standing on top of a parapet using the most awful language at the prospect of having to spend a cold night in his wet clothes. He probably would much rather have He probably would much rather have

The Germans have brought up one of their big naval guns. It has an armour-piercing shell, which, fortunately, does not always burst. We have been taking the magnetic bearing with the compass of one just outside. After striking the ground it cut through the earth 22 feet underground, the turf still remaining in position. It then came up to the surtons of Kansas City, a guest at the J. M. Meade home; Mrs. David Gossett and Miss Ruth Bauer.
